Coding Guide for Twitter Counter Speech Dataset

Description of Dataset

The data stems from American Twitter users and spans the period from 2008 to 2019. However, the vast majority of tweets fall between 2016 and 2019, in line with Trump's presidency. Therefore, a lot of Twitter users are talking about American issues, and particularly matters related to the Trump presidency.

The dataset consists of pairs of tweets. The first tweet (called the referenced tweet) can be a tweet of any kind, i.e., an original post, a reply to a tweet, or a quote tweet. The second tweet will always be a reply or quote tweet of the referenced tweet (i.e., the reply tweet). Both the referenced tweet and the reply tweet will be coded. All tweets will be coded based on textual information only (pictures, videos, or linked content has been removed).

Referenced tweets have been pre-selected from a wider dataset of tweets based on their score for political hate, as measured by the semantic similarity (cosine similarity) between the tweet and the words "politics", "hate", "fuck", using the Facebook Fasttext word-vector model (SOURCE for FACEBOOK, cutoffs as either: incivility ("fuck") > .55 & politics > .40, or hate > .5 & politics > .3).

The total number of tweet-pairs to be coded is 5839.

Note that tweets have been cleaned in the following way:

- Tagged usernames have been anonymized, except for users that are named at least 100 times in the dataset, for which we can assume that they constitute some kind of public figure or celebrity (e.g. @POTUS). Anonymized usernames were replaced with "@user".
- All links have been replaced with "<link>".

Coding strategy and coding categories

Both the referenced tweet and the reply tweet will be coded in pair-wise fashion. This means that annotators will first code (label) the referenced tweet, and then code its reply tweet, before moving to the next referenced tweet.

The first 200 tweet-pairs will be coded by all five annotators, to assess intercoder reliability, and to create a common ground among annotators. The remaining 5639 tweet pairs will be randomly distributed to annotators, such that each tweet will be labelled by exactly 3 annotators.

The tweets will be coded along the following dimensions / labels:

- Tweet type
  - Antagonizing
  - Meta Comment
  - Other Political Statement

- Tweet Tone
  - Hateful
  - Constructive

- Agreement with reference tweet (only for reply tweets)
  - Agree
  - Disagree
  - Unclear

- Unclassifiable

Please note that sometimes, tweets may contain elements of several dimensions. In these cases, tweets should be labelled using all the categories that apply. For example, if a tweet contains some constructive notions, but is also very hateful, this tweet should be coded as both constructive and hateful.

In the following, we describe the different coding labels to be used for both referenced tweets and reply tweets. Each label description comes with a few examples and explanations for why these tweets should be coded in the described way.

Tweet type

As a first set of labels, a tweet should be coded relative to what type of tweet it is. In particular, we are interested in distinguishing between antagonizing tweets, meta comments about hate, and other kinds of political expressions.

These labels are mutually exclusive, meaning that tweets should not be coded as for example both "Meta comment" and "Antagonizing". The labels "Antagonizing" / "Other political opinion" take priority over "Meta comment". For example, when a tweet has both some meta comment element, and also an antagonistic element, the tweet should be coded as antagonizing.

Note that this decision is independent of tweet tone (hateful, constructive – see below). This means that, for instance, antagonizing tweets can be written in constructive, hateful, or neutral ways (i.e., neither constructive nor hateful).

Antagonizing

Antagonizing tweets are those tweets that accuse another party / group / person of being bad in some way. For instance, they may be calling someone else stupid, hypocritical, evil, a troll, nazi, etc.

This accusation can often be implicit (e.g., implying that another group / person is being hypocritical).

One other typical example of this type of tweet would be accusations of hate, i.e. accusing someone or some group of being hateful.

This classification should be made independent of whether one thinks the attack / accusation is justified or not. This means it is not necessary to agree that someone is indeed racist to code a tweet as antagonizing.

Examples of antagonizing tweets:

i. I hATE ron paul

→ This tweet is antagonistic against Ron Paul.

ii. Trump used the wall during campaign because his supporters are a bunch of racists.
Now, people are not getting paid, because of racism. It's just so. Fucked. Up.

→ This tweet is calling all Trump supporters racist. It is therefore antagonizing against trump supporters.

iii. If you didn't realize how contrived and insufferable progressive millennials are, this will explain it perfectly. <Link>

→ This tweet characterizes millennials of being contrived and insufferable.

iv. @user I'm beginning to wonder if several of his most toxic supporters are bots/plants designed to turn people off to him as a whole...The problem is that there are enough supporters that aren't bots/trolls literally panicking and rushing to call people names (centrist! Intolerant!).

→ This tweet antagonizes against hateful ('toxic') supporters of a politician, and what effects that may have.

v. The president's fans seem far more upset by my (obvious) joke about banning hats than they were when the President said literally the same thing about banning actual human beings. Go figure.

→ This tweet is implicitly accusing "Trump fans" of being hypocritical.

vi. Reference tweet:*
Honestly, I do believe that being gay is a sin, & I've never judged anyone's for it, but that doesn't mean I support it

Reply:
Wow this is dumb af.

→ Both referenced and reply tweet are antagonizing.
The referenced tweet is an edge case, as this person is saying they're not judging gay people. Nevertheless, the first statement is antagonizing against gay people.

The reply tweet is clearly antagonizing, calling the statement dumb as fuck.

vii. Referenced tweet:
The hate storm being leveled by the left at Ashley Kavanaugh is a good indicator of what they really think of women---or at least any women with whom they disagree. So enough already with the liberal lecturing about "respect" and "bullying."

Reply tweet:
not surprising. The left will do anything to get their own way. Its despicable <Link>

→ Both referenced and reply tweet are antagonizing. "the left" is being talked about in a derogatory way.

viii. @user @user Another one. The problem with this shite is that people see them and think they are real people with real opinions when in fact they are either right wing avatars trolling with racism or automated bots posting division. That @Twitter won't sort this out is pretty disgusting <LINK>

→ This tweet is antagonizing against right wing avatars, and against Twitter

Meta-Comment about hate

Tweets that are quoting statements that reference hate.

The primary case of meta-comments constitutes tweets that quote another person's statements about hate, without positioning themselves. For example, news accounts often cite other people making comments that are antagonistic. However, if these quotes are not accompanied with text that shows the tweet author's own stance, these tweets should be coded as meta commentary.

Examples:

i. *Trump on CBS 60 Minutes interview says he hates harassment of minority groups by supporters: "I will say it right to the camera: Stop it."*

→ This tweet quotes Trump making a statement about hate. Even though it emphasizes the hate, the overall tone is still neutral, and not antagonizing.

ii. President @realDonaldTrump: "The Democrats don't like being called an angry mob but, really, that's what they've become. They've gone so far left, they can't even believe that they're over there." <link> → Similar as the first example, this tweet quotes Trump making a statement, about how hateful the left is (Trump's statement itself would be labelled as antagonizing).

iii. Tomi Lahren: Protesting has been "cheapened by these man-hating feminists" <link> <link>

→ Another quote of an antagonizing statement. Yet, without taking position (e.g., condemning, or endorsing it), this tweet is meta-commentary.

Other political Statement

This category is designed to catch tweets that are neither antagonizing nor meta comments, but contain some political message. What is "political" is to be understood broadly, and goes beyond party-political issues and include politicized issues such as gender, the environment etc.

A political statement of this type expresses an opinion and can take many forms, including expressing criticism and disagreement without being antagonizing. Note however that many forms of critiquing comments will likely be antagonizing.

Examples

i. @user FEMINISM === EQUALITY
U THINK FEMINISM IS WRONG ??? THEN U THINK EQUALITY IS WRONG

→ This tweet about feminism and equality. Although there is some sense of antagonism in here, the dominant theme is something else.

ii. If you do not want that kind of support, you do actually have to overtly denounce them.

→ This tweet is expressing an opinion about the necessity of distancing oneself from presumably radical groups.

iii. @user Agreed. Its odd, cuz it's good to recognize, but to your point, it shouldn't cause a buzz. And, I feel LGBT plots are being misused

→ This tweet expresses the opinion that LGBT issues are misused for certain agendas, maybe to stir up interest.

iv. Dear White People: Attending #BlackPanther doesn't mean you cured racism.

→ This tweet is an edge case, as it also a small antagonistic element, implying that some white people may overestimate their contribution to fighting racism. However, we feel that the antagonism is not strong enough to fall under this label.

v. The concept that you shouldn't criticize your own political party or "allies" is stupid. Stop worshipping politicians. When people are wrong, call them out or you're part of the problem.

→ This tweet expresses a call for less partisan bias. Although there is some element of implied against antagonism against people who show that kind bias, the generic nature in which this statement is written, the comment reads more as an opinion rather than an attack.

vi. Reference tweet
America will never be great again until there's less hate again. Left vs Right Black vs White must stop the fight!The enemy is Isis dammit us

Reply tweet
@user Everybody is SO angry!

→ Both referenced tweet and reply are opinion tweets, talking about how much hate there is around. Although the referenced tweet is antagonizing against ISIS, the overall impression is that this tweet author wants to unite Americans, rather than attack / antagonize against ISIS.

vii. What is the difference between "terrorism" and "hate crime" other than the race of the victim?

→ This voices an opinion about (missing) differences between hate crimes and terrorist attacks. It is a bit of an edge case since one might read an implied intention that is slightly antagonistic (making a difference between "hate crime" and "terrorism" is racist). However, this implication is not strong enough to warrant alternate categorization.

Tweet Tone

The next set of labels regards the tone of the tweet, whether it has elements that are hateful or constructive. Importantly, it is possible for tweets to have both hateful and constructive elements or neither of them to a sufficient extent (neutral tweets).

Hateful

Does the tweet contain hateful elements?

Hateful elements are defined as any expression of the motivation to degrade, harass, or intimidate individuals or collectives based on political differences or discriminatory views.

This is always a judgement call, as the intention of the tweet author can be very hard to infer, but a couple of rules of thumb could help:

1. Statements that ascribe demeaning or dehumanizing characteristics to an individual or group by labeling them as e.g., stupid, evil, a troll, nazi, despicable, dogs etc. are often hateful. This means that tweets that are coded as antagonizing (tweet type) is often also hateful, but not necessarily.

2. Statements that say "I hate X" should be coded as hateful, when X refers to a person or group of people. One caveat applies in that sometimes, people use the word hate in a very soft way ("I hate to bother you, but…"). In these cases, or when statements are ironic, tweets should not be regarded as hateful.

3. Statements that are uncivil, make use of slurs (e.g. the N word), are often hateful. Not all uncivil comments are necessarily hateful, but the use of derogatory terms can be a good indicator of hateful messages.

4. Statements that are merely saying that someone is hateful (e.g., "Trump is so full of hate"), do not count as hateful. While these tweets may typically be antagonizing, the mere accusation of someone or some group being hateful is not enough. Of course, when such statements are accompanied by other hateful markers, they should still be labelled as hateful.

Examples of hateful referenced tweets:

i. I hATE ron paul

→ This a simple expression of hate towards a person.

ii. If you did''t realize how contrived and insufferable progressive millennials are, this will explain it perfectly. <Link>

→ This tweet is hateful towards progressive millennials as it highlights very negative qualities about them (contrived, insufferable). In this sense it is degrading.

iii. How come all the people who support gun-control are so fucking ugly? <link>

→ This tweet is degrading people supporting gun-control.

iv. Trump used the wall during campaign because his supporters are a bunch of racists.
Now, people are not getting paid, because of racism. It's just so. Fucked. Up.

→ This tweet is calling all Trump supporters racists. It is therefore degrading this group.

v. Scares me that people like this actually can vote to be honest. There's a difference between political opinion and flat out ignorance and disrespect. <link>

→ Calling for a group of people to not have the right to vote is discriminatory.

Examples of hateful reply tweets:

vi. Referenced tweet:
Since I called #Individual1 a piece of shit for congratulating a judge for trying to takeaway the ACA, again, in the last hour I've been called a leftist, ignoramous, Libby, libtard, stupid, loser, & a host of other great adjectives by BOTS & MAGATS. What a great night

Reply tweet:
@user #TrumpCultists hate the truth. They're also riled up because they are finally faced with the knowledge their hero is a traitor and a crook.

→ This reply doubles down on hate leveled towards "TrumpCultists". It further propagates hateful messages regarding Trump calling him names derogatory terms like 'traitor' and 'crook'.

vii. Referenced tweet:
@user Let's only hope that the protection of freedom of speech will not become a too easy excuse for parents, teachers, community and educators to do nothing about this painful public expression of hate speech in the form of the Nazi salute.

Reply tweet:
@user @user Could you people be any dumber? The photographer asked them to put their hands in the air to wave it's not a fucking Nazi salute. They're a bunch of school kids not Rudolph Hess. Stop looking for Nazis under every rock.

→ This reply attacks the author of the referenced tweet ("any dumber") with a derogatory term.

viii. Referenced tweet:
First off @user what the heck are still doing there continuing with you lies & hate rhetoric! I thought you were leaving 🤔

Secondly as you speak for a man who spews hate worst than any other leader in this country. Disgraceful & SAD!

#ResignTrump

Reply tweet:
@user @user What is outrageous & inappropriate is you, ugly Sarah.

→ This reply attacks the author of the referenced tweet by calling her 'ugly'.

Examples of antagonistic but NOT hateful tweets:

i. The president's fans seem far more upset by my (obvious) joke about banning hats than they were when the President said literally the same thing about banning actual human beings. Go figure.

→ This tweet is antagonizing against Trump "fans". It is accusing them of hypocrisy, but it is not degrading or demeaning as such.

ii. Bad faith "readings" and emotionalism all over the place. If people can't reason about a serious lacuna in the progressive platform, then the Republic is screwed.

→ This tweet is accusing progressives of being overly emotional and acting in bad faith.

iii. Is it just me, or are other people sick of Republican senators looking very, very concerned – without actually doing anything?

→ This tweet is accusing Republican senators of being hypocritical by looking concerned but not doing anything. While this reads as a strong critique, it does not qualify as degrading.

Constructive

Does the tweet contain constructive or prosocial elements?

Constructive elements imply a prosocial attitude, signaling the disapproval of hate or hostile behavior, or tweets that aim to side with, shield or comfort an individual victim or victimized group. In other words, the tweet tries to establish or restore favorable conditions for civil political discussion online (either in the short or the long term).

Note that the mere labelling of someone as a racist, white supremacist, liar, …, without backing up these statements with information about why this accusation is deserved should not count as constructive. For example: "Politician X is a racist" is not constructive, whereas "This law is racist because it will affect black people differently from white people" would count as constructive.

Depending on whom they address (victim of hate, perpetrator of hate, larger audience), constructive tweets may take the following forms:

Towards victims of hate:

- Expressing support ("I am with you", "I am here", "DMs are always open if you want to talk", "I am so sorry you have to experience this")
- Shielding ("Don't listen to this jerk")
- Offering advice ("this is over the line. Don't feel bad about reporting people that act like this")

Towards perpetrators of hate:

- trying to educate authors of a hateful post by providing facts that counter the hateful message (e.g. "this is actually not correct, the xxx clearly states that …"), in a sincere and non-ironic manner.
- Pointing out inconsistencies by asking questions, in a Socratic manner, "If you think this is true, do you also think that ... is true?"
- warning them of consequences of hateful messages (e.g., "your comment is against platform regulations! Be careful, or your account might get deleted", "blocked and reported")
- trying to get perpetrators to empathize with the target of their hate (e.g., "this is hurtful to xxx")
- calling out hate speech, but note mere labelling exception detailed above (e.g. "this is racism", "this is hatespeech", …)
- appealing to a shared trait, e.g. common humanity, equal rights ("we're all human", …)

Towards the general public / Twitter audience:

- Calling for a better culture of debate (e.g., "Let's keep things civil and informative on here")

Examples of constructive referenced tweets:

i. @user @user I'm a total man, but stand up for American women and I stand against oppression and ANY KIND of prejudice: be it color of skin/Belief, or lack of, God, Nationalty, gender, preference of live & sex...FOLKS, THIS SUPPOSED TO BE THE LAND OF THE FREE...LET'S MAKE IT TRULY FREE!!

→ This tweet expresses support for women, making an appeal towards a shared value system, speaking out against all kinds of oppression.

ii. Y'all, @user taking us to CHURCH, saying how public health can/does/must stand against racism, homophobia, xenophobia. #APHA2017

→ This tweet commends another user who is providing important information on how to stand against hate.

iii. Let's try and do something rare on twitter and have a civil and honest conversation ? Hope you are game. First, please watch what I said. I praised her. I didn't attack her. My attack was on what I called dishonest progressivism which is not an attack on progressivism. <link>

→ this referenced tweet tries to restore favorable conditions for civil discussion on Twitter.

Examples of constructive reply tweets:

iv. Referenced tweet:
Scares me that people like this actually can vote to be honest. There's a difference between political opinion and flat out ignorance and disrespect. <link>

Reply tweet:
Nah fuck this. Everyone deserves the right to vote. Every voice should be heard even if it's a shitty voice. <link>

→ This reply is appealing to equal rights to vote despite differing opinions. It is a call to tolerating voices you disagree with, accepting their equal right.

v. Referenced tweet:
Some very odd people R saying I'm a pedo, re: a joke from a time not that long ago when hard absurd jokes by comedians were acknowledged for what they were — jokes — not a disingenuous national threat to people fake-clutching their pearls (whilst ranting the country's too PC)

Reply tweet:
@user @user #Pedophile "jokes" are not jokes at all. There's nothing even remotely funny about them. If you make those jokes then you are complicit. #PedoWood #Pedogate #Pizzagate #TheGreatAwakening #WalkAway

→ This tweet is trying to educate the author of the referenced tweet that pedophile jokes are no "joking matter". Note that although the author of the reply tweet is a likely Qanon supporter (as identifiable by the hashtags they use), the notion of this tweet can however still be considered constructive.

vi. Referenced tweet:
@user @user I'm a total man, but stand up for American women and I stand against oppression and ANY KIND of prejudice: be it color of skin/Belief, or lack of, God, Nationality, gender, preference of sex...FOLKS, THIS SUPPOSED TO BE THE LAND OF THE FREE...LET'S MAKE IT TRULY FREE!!

Reply tweet:
@user @user @user You got it right Charles, you are a total man. ♡

→ This tweet is supporting the author of the referenced tweet in their positive message of standing up against all kinds of prejudice.

vii. Referenced tweet:
@user @user'Liberals don't believe in free speech. They want to silence anyone that doesn't agree with them or criticizes them.

Reply tweet:
@user If I told everyone your children who were killed in a mass shooting are crisis actors, I would be furious too. Be best. 😢

→ This reply is constructive because it tries to elicit empathy with the target in the hater.

viii. Referenced tweet:
@user @user I'd just like a day off from the hassles. Making claims of hate speech or sexist speech when none exists is abuse, especially when used to call in others based on that allegation. That's targeted harassment.

Reply tweet:
Rude boy continues not to apologize for sexist #hatespeech . Women scientists may be wrong, but they are not "kooky." <link>

→ Both referenced tweet and reply are constructive. They are both calling each other out, and doing so in an informative way, i.e., explaining what the offending behavior is and why it's hurtful. Note that the reply is also hateful, calling the author of the referenced tweet a rude "boy" is demeaning – implying that they have limited intellectual capacities.

Examples of both hateful AND constructive tweets

As stated above, sometimes tweets can have both hateful and constructive elements. Here are a few examples:

ix. Jesus, Trump's Montana speech reads like straight-up evil. Lie upon lie upon lie, broken up by hate speech and deeply personal insults aimed at pretty much anyone who opposes him. Anything unflattering is fake, everyone else is bad and stupid… WTF

→ this tweet is both calling out something hateful in a detailed way (constructive), but is also hateful in the way it does it, implying that Trump is 'straight-up evil' and a liar.

x. Since 2012, Ogawa Eitaro, has been the lapdog and the pit-bull of Prime Minister Abe. He published and essay that argued men should have the right to molest women and that LGBT were no different from ass-fetishists and deserved no rights.

→ this tweet is both calling out something hateful (Eitaro is hateful against women and LGBT people), but is also hateful in calling him 'lapdog' and 'pit-bull' which is dehumanizing.

Agreement with referenced tweet

This set of labels is only relevant for reply tweets. Agreement with the referenced tweet is supposed to indicate whether the reply tweet author agrees in spirit with what is said in the referenced tweet. Note that sometimes, people may agree ironically, thus such tweets should ideally be coded as disagreeing.

For example, this helps disambiguate whether a hateful reply to a hateful reference tweet is doubling down on the hate (agreeing), or countering hate with hate (disagreeing).

This set of labels is mutually exclusive (replies cannot agree and disagree at the same time). If the stance of the reply is unclear, or mixed, reply tweet agreement should be coded as "unclear".

Note: A special rule of thumb that applies when replies are agreeing is the inheritance rule. Reply tweets that agree with the referenced tweet typically inherit the tweet type categorization of the referenced tweet (i.e., they should be coded in similar ways), unless they clearly deviate in type. This most often applies when replies are short. For instance, if someone replies to an antagonizing tweet with "so true", this reply should also be labelled as antagonizing. This also applies somewhat to tweet tone: if someone replies to a hateful tweet with "exactly!", this reply should also be labelled as hateful.

Agree Examples

i. Referenced tweet:
Since I called #Individual1 a piece of shit for congratulating a judge for trying to takeaway the ACA, again, in the last hour I've been called a leftist, ignoramous, Libby, libtard, stupid, loser, & a host of other great adjectives by BOTS & MAGATS. What a great night

Reply tweet:
@user #TrumpCultists hate the truth. They're also riled up because they are finally faced with the knowledge their hero is a traitor and a crook.

→ This reply is agreeing with the referenced tweet by further attacking the victim (i.e., it is doubling down on hate).

ii. Referenced tweet:
fuck paul ryan, fuck everyone who enabled him and thank god the next generation of journalists knows that a white supremacist enabler with a powerful chin is still a white supremacist enabler

Reply tweet:
@user I love you. I'm writing 500 words as we speak about why Paul Ryan is one of the worst people in the world. Thank you for this.

→ This reply is agreeing with / doubling down on the hate against Paul Ryan in the referenced tweet.

iii. Referenced tweet:
She's got game! I am going to enjoy the spunky kid in her, while hating her dangerous, harebrained socialist claptrap. <link>

Reply tweet:
She is so adorable. Bad teeth, no shame about calling attn to same w red lipstick, & all. Little-kid look goes with the naivete about politics. I'm glad at least my USRep remembers socialism has already failed. <link>

→ The reply is agreeing with the hateful portrayal first expressed in the referenced tweet by painting a picture of the person as naïve and kid-like in her view on politics. It thus doubles down on the hate.

iv. Referenced tweet:
I understand that you may be afraid to tweet #StopTheBias because you're afraid that you may be banned next. And that may happen. But if we don't stand for free speech, what do we stand for?

Reply tweet:
*If we all tweet #StopTheBias and support @user & @user , we might restore reason to @Twitter. If Twitter bans more people, Twitter loses credibility...I was last banned by Associated Content,. Hoot. Remember Associated Content? <link>*

→ The reply author is agreeing with the political protest idea in tweeting "stop the bias" tweets.

Disagree Examples

i. Referenced tweet:
@user @user Liberals don't believe in free speech. They want to silence anyone that doesn't agree with them or criticizes them.

Reply tweet:
@user If I told everyone your children who were killed in a mass shooting are crisis actors, I would be furious too. Be best. 🤬

→ This reply is disagreeing (constructively) with the referenced tweet.

ii. Referenced tweet:
This is the party of "tolerance". The leftists have really lost touch.
They have no platform other than hate and they can't stand that @user is winning and showing Americans how bad their liberal policies have been for America.
Even the media can't fix it for them!

Reply tweet:
@user @user Right. Dems are the hateful ones? Look in the mirror.

→ This reply is disagreeing with the tweet author by countering a hateful counterspeech message with hate directed towards the author of the referenced tweet.

iii. Referenced tweet:
How awful. Criticizing poor scholarship is not sexist or hate speech. Another example of misuse to #MeToo to foment anger against #scicomm and public scientists speaking the truth. <link>

Reply tweet:
Scientists can criticize poor scholarship by raising issues with articles, but not with #hatespeech like calling women "kooky." #MeToo <link>

→ This reply is disagreeing with the statement in the referenced tweet and provides a clear a constructive example of how one could alternatively (e.g., by raising issues with articles) have phrased one's critique in a more pro-social way.

Unclear

(see also unclassifiable examples below)

i. Referenced tweet:
If you do not want that kind of support, you do actually have to overtly denounce them.

Reply tweet:
Wtf is happening to this country!?

→ It is unclear what exactly the intention of the reply is. Without knowing more of the context, the question could be read both as in agreement (why are people not denouncing this), or as in disagreement (a general sense of despair)

Non-classifiable

These tweets are replies that cannot meaningfully be classified as either containing elements of hate or constructiveness. They are often very short tweets, or tweets that refer to something not political, or something external that cannot be seen (e.g. a simple url to some external website, or posting an image). This project is limited to building a classifier for text data, thus we had to remove all non-textual data.

i. Referenced tweet:
Opinion: How Republicans got so mean and clueless <Link>

Reply tweet*:*
Practice, practice.... <Link>

→ it is unclear what exactly is meant here without knowing what the link refers to.

ii. Reference tweet:
But….Jussie made it political with the men in their MAGA Hats. He hates Trump.

Reply tweet:
@user Leave the presence of a fool, or you will not discern words of knowledge. Provers 14:7

→ The intended meaning of this bible quote is hard to place in this context.

iii. Referenced tweet:
What idiot called them "grammer nazis" and not "strunk and white supremacists"

Reply tweet*:*
LOL

→ it is unclear what exactly is meant here. The LOL (laughing out loud) could express that the replying user found the referenced tweet funny, but it could also be used in a derogatory way. Without further information we are unable to tell.
